The challenge of this assignment was to photograph something that didn't exist: the MassArt Art Museum. This was Boston's newest art museum, opening in several months' time, so there was nothing to give a flavor of what was to come. The space was a character as much as the executive director, Lisa Tung, so I let the walls and windows do the talking. Bringing this new museum to Boston was an uphill battle, so posing her below the stairs was a symbol of that. In the end, the empty space helped tell the story – she, just like her artists, started with a blank canvas.
